Facebook's share surprise for Zuckerberg's hearing

Anybody cheering the demise of Facebook might be speaking too soon after its shares climbed 2.5 percent during founder Mark Zuckerberg's hearing before a group of US Senators.

Mr Zuckerberg's appearance marked the beginning of a two-day stretch for the mogul in Congress.

Recent privacy scandals over user data have led to many questioning the effect of the social media giant, with a campaign even urging people to delete their accounts.

Mark Zuckerberg should be grinning - Facebook's shares actually rose during his Congress hearing.

But despite Mr Zuckerberg's apologies for the scandals and his description of combating Russian hackers as an "arms race", it does not appear to have affected the company's worth.

Mumbrella's Paul Wallbank does not believe Facebook is likely to change its ways too much.

"That's really Facebook's bread and butter, this is where they make their money," he said.

"These platforms are looking at collecting as much data on you (as possible) because it's much more valuable as a marketer to have that sort of context on what you're planning with your holidays, with trips, with important things like anniversaries and so on."

However, he said the data collected - which could include family and relationship information - would likely continue to be regarded as harmless.

"In 15 years of covering this particular space, I've always expected a point to come where people say 'that's enough and I'm giving too much of my privacy away'," Wallbank said.
