â€™More money, less hoursâ€™™: How dad makes $2k a week delivering parcels

As cost of living rises, more and more Australians are turning to the burgeoning "share economy" to help make ends meet - and put a little extra aside.

People are turning their empty parking spots, unused storage spaces and even campervans into evergreen sources of income.

David Spano overhauled his career to work half the hours he used to, while still earning up to $2000 a week.

"I'm working less hours to earn more money," he told A Current Affair.

David Spano works as a delivery driver for Zoom2u, and can make up to $2000 a week.

Mr Spano decided to take up a job with more flexible hours three years ago after his first child was born.

He signed up to be a driver for Zoom2u, a parcel delivery service that works like Uber.

However, the job means he works half the hours of a typical courier shift.

Customers also save up to 40 percent by using the service, as compared to traditional couriers, and they can track their parcel online in real-time.

Mr Spano said the job involved "more money and less hours".

Katherine Waterson and her family turned their hobby into a career three years ago.

She left her full-time job, bought an extra four campervans, and now makes a living hiring them out on Camplify.

The vans can fetch in $500-$700 for a weekend.

Katherine Waterson's camping hobby has also allowed her to make a living through renting campervans.

Lisa Hodgkins, however, doesn't have to outlay anything for her extra cash.

The mother of two uses Spacer to rent out her empty parking spot and storage room.

The former fetches her $300 a month, the latter about $150.

She has made about $10,000 in the past two years with the platform.

The Sharing Hub co-founder Mike Rosenbaum said there was a "global mega-trend" towards the sharing economy, beginning with businesses such as Airbnb and Uber - both of which will turn 10 in 2018.

"Typically it's not a fulltime job but it helps you pay for that extra family holiday, pay for the bills," he said.
